SESSION 1

Stonewall to Soho: Transatlantic Exchanges in Queer Theatre and Performance

convened by Jay Paul Skelton

The Art of the Culture War: Lessons from the Battlefields with Phoebe Patey-Ferguson

A decade ago, teaching at UK-based university about the US culture wars in the 1990s and the concurrent state censorship of queer art, the subject felt like a faraway historical moment. Today, it reads like a playbook doomed to be repeated on both sides of the Atlantic. As Carol Jacobsen argued in 1991, when ultraconservatives transform expressions of sexual pleasure and desire into sites of moral panic, "their strategy is a calculated offensive meant to buttress the masculinist power structure." Through examining the 2024 moral panic around - and subsequent censorship of - REIN, a radical queer feminist performance work in Scotland, alongside historical battles over artistic freedom, this paper reveals how collusion between a far-right press, right-wing politicians, and fearful arts institutions attack queer artistic expression. While these fights emerge in specific cultural and historical contexts - there are alarming commonalities which can allow us to understand what tactics might need to be brought into action to continue to defend and expand queer performance on both sides of the Atlantic.

Queer Practice, Queer Pedagogy: A Transatlantic Conversation on Voice and Actor Training with Becca Barret and Richard Delaney moderated by Jay Paul Skelton

This conversation between two leading US- and UK-based scholar-facilitators examines how queer perspectives reshape what and how we train performers. Richard and Becca will reflect on bodies, voices, and the presence of authority in the training room, and ask how both practice and pedagogy can make space for difference, risk, and transformation.

Surviving the Crossing: A Queer Migrant Dialogue Between London and New York with Alejandro Postigo and Edu Diaz

This practice-as-research presentations takes the form of a live, staged exchange between Alejandro Postigo (London-based Spanish queer performance-maker) and Edu Díaz (New York-based Spanish actor and theatre practitioner). Part dialogue, part informal performance lecture, the encounter explores queer migrant survival, acting practice, and cultural translation across UK and US theatre contexts.

SESSION 1

'Method-building?': Working, living and coping with Sam Wanamaker's Globe mission

Patrick Spottiswoode (Founder, Globe Education - Shakespeare's Globe) and Zoë Wanamaker (actress and daughter of Sam Wanamaker) discuss Sam Wanamaker's vision for Shakespeare's Globe — and its professional and personal impacts on them

SESSION 2

Jewish Methods: How Jewish-American Practitioners Influenced Contemporary British Actor Training

convened by Conrad Cohen

‘Judaizing’ Method Acting: The Necessity of a Jewish Pedagogy for the Meisner Technique

with Conrad Cohen

The Meisner technique is one of the most prevalent acting practices found throughout British drama schools today. However its application is limited without a significant understanding of the context in which Meisner developed his actor training practice, especially as the son of Jewish refugees who grew up amongst New York’s Yiddish-speaking community. Like many methods of Jewish-American acting teachers, there seems to have been an appropriation of their work in ways which do not truly reflect their pedagogy possibly due to a lack of acknowledgement of their ethnic positionality as marginalised Jewish immigrants, and possibly even leading to antisemitically-laced prejudice against them and ‘the Method’. This workshop-paper explores how a more direct acknowledgment of Meisner’s Jewish heritage can offer a robust and reparative application of his acting techniques.

Doreen Cannon Changed My Life (and the nature of actor training in London drama schools)

with Margaret Coldiron

I wanted to come to London to learn to be a real Shakespearean actress, so I skipped my Law School Admission Test and went to New York City to audition for the Drama Centre, London. That was when I first met Doreen Cannon, then Head of Acting at the school. She was a formidable personality and a very demanding teacher. It was challenging, but I survived the audition and the training and went back to the US as a real Shakespearean actress.

The ethos of drama schools and drama training in London in the 1960s and 70s was utterly different from today, and Doreen Cannon is, I believe, the reason for that. I was privileged to take over her work at Drama Centre when she moved on to teach at RADA. The idea that an infamous, loud-mouthed American should teach method acting at that venerable institution was, at that time, an astonishingly revolutionary notion. Unsurprisingly, she transformed the training. Her methods, derived from her work at HB Studios with Herbert Berghof and Uta Hagen, have influenced all the major London drama schools through the people she trained, and the people trained by her former students. We all carry her with us in the work that we do, whether performing, teaching or directing.

This paper will examine the life and legacy of Doreen Cannon as one of the most significant figures in British actor training in the twentieth century. It may indulge in some shameless autobiographical activities along the way, but it will achieve its objective.

SESSION 2

The Heart of the Method with Lola Cohen

The heart of the Method with a focus on Lee Strasberg's technique, legacy and impact on the craft of acting. There will be a demonstration of Relaxation and Sense Memory exercises.

SESSION 2

Shakespeare in Washington: Past, Present, and Future (Online)

SESSION 3

Beyond the Hollywood Ten: 'Un-American' Americans and the British Theatre Industry

convened by Hannah Merlander

Sam Wanamaker: Cultural Entrepreneur with Paul Prescott

Long before he became synonymous with Shakespeare and pseudo-Elizabethanism, Sam Wanamaker was an extraordinary cultural entrepreneur bringing Russian, German and American influences to the British stage. This talk considers his innovative and shape-shifting work as an actor, director and theatre manager in the two tumultuous decades after his exile from the US.

"More English than the Brits": Hollywood's Exiles in 1950s Britain with Rebecca Prime

During the 1950s and early 1960s, London was home to a significant group of blacklisted American filmmakers: the directors Cy Endfield, Joseph Losey, and Bernard Vorhaus; the screenwriters Harold Buchman, Lester Cole, Carl Foreman, Ian McLellan Hunter, Howard Koch, Donald Ogden Stewart, and Frank Tarloff; the writer/producer Adrian Scott and his wife (the television writer Joan LaCour Scott); the producer Bob Roberts; the actors Phil Brown and Sam Wanamaker; and the composer Larry Adler. For many in the exile "colony," the theatre provided an entry point into Britain's creative industries, presenting them with much-needed employment opportunities and in some instances, flourishing new careers. This presentation will provide an overview of the blacklisted community in London and their work in theatre, television, and film during the years of their political exile. Through a focus on three of the most successful of the exiles—Cy Endfield, Carl Foreman, and Joseph Losey—it will discuss the creative impact of exile and how these filmmakers' sense of displacement shaped their aesthetic engagement with British culture.

Paul Robeson - The Artist Must Take Sides with Hakim Adi

In 1938 at a concert in the Royal Albert Hall in support of Republican Spain, the famous African American actor and singer Paul Robeson delivered one of his most notable speeches – 'The artist,' he declared, 'must take sides. He must elect to fight for freedom or slavery.' He concluded, 'I have made my choice. I had no alternative.' Robeson was already by this time one of the most famous American actors in Britain, where he lived for most of the 1930s. He first appeared on stage in this country in the 1922 and by the late 1930s had already made numerous appearances including an early appearance as Othello (with Peggy Ashcroft) in London, as well as appearing in British films such as Song of Freedom (1936) and Proud Valley (1939). In the years leading up to the Second World War he was voted one of Britain's favourite singers and film stars.

SESSION 3

Robeson's speech in 1938 was one of many political statements he made during those years. He took a stand not only for the rights of his own oppressed people but most notably against fascism and for the rights of all. In this period, he performed at the Unity Theatre and began to incorporate folk and political songs from many countries into his concert repertoire.

During the war years became a celebrated performer in the US, most notably for his portrayal of Othello, as well as a fervent supporter of the war effort, and he performed for US troops overseas. In 1945 he was chosen to read the actors' tribute at President Roosevelt's funeral. In the post-war period Robeson continued his international career, touring many countries including eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. He continued his political activities too, campaigning against lynching in the US, in support of the people of South Africa, against colonialism, and for world peace.

Although Robeson received numerous awards and honours during the 1940s, in the immediate post-war period he was already being persecuted for his political views. He first appeared before an 'Un-American Activities Committee' in 1946, this demanded to know if he was a member of the Communist Party. The attacks intensified after a speech in Paris in 1949 in which he declared it 'unthinkable that American Negroes will go to war on behalf of those who have oppressed us for generations.' In 1950 his passport was confiscated by the US government and in the years following many of his US concerts were cancelled. Robeson refused to capitulate and in 1956 Robeson denounced McCarthy's Un-American Activities Committee as 'Un-American.'

During the period of his persecution by the US government Robeson continued to receive support from many other countries and in Britain from Equity, numerous trade unions and MPs. In 1957 he performed concerts by telephone to Britain for the National 'Let Paul Robeson Sing' Committee and the Eisteddfod. Robeson maintained his stand that 'the artist must take sides,' continuing to speak out against racism, colonialism and injustice as well as for world peace. When international pressure forced the return of his passport in 1958, Robeson toured Britain and the Soviet Union and sang in St Paul's Cathedral. In 1959 he performed Othello at Stratford, despite ill health and continued to visit Britain for TV and radio broadcasts in 1960 and 1961.

Robeson's great contributions to British stage, screen and radio were immense. Nobody who heard or saw him ever forgot the experience. However, the political stand that he took and never wavered from, made perhaps an even greater lasting impression. While for Robeson it was in Britain that he learned 'that the essential character of a nation is determined not by the upper classes, but by the common people, and that the common people of all nations are truly brothers in the great family of mankind.'

"A guest in your country": Bertolt Brecht between Europe and America with Tom Kuhn

*From the moment of the Nazi seizure of power in Germany in 1933 Brecht went into exile, first in Europe (Denmark) and then, as the war progressed, from 1941 in the United States (California). Despite being cut off from much practical theatre work, he not only wrote many of his most famous plays in this period, his theatre and acting theory also progressed by leaps. In this paper I will describe these developments and try to assess how far his immediate cultural (and geographical) context affected his ideas. In 1947 he was hauled before the House Un-American Activities Committee and cross-questioned about his politics. The next day he flew back to Europe and eventually settled in East Berlin. In 1948 he published his manifesto for the theatre, The Small Organon. Again, we have to ask what influence his American experience had on this great theoretical essay and to what extent there was dialogue between the American and the European theatre.*

SESSION 4

'Lifting It Up': Hip-hop, Shakespeare and the Poetics of Black Speech

with Jonzi D, Sideeq Heard (MIO '14), Tristan Fynn-Aideunu and Miriam A. Hyman (MIO'10)/ Robyn Hood, moderated by Hanh Bui, interim Head of Research at Shakespeare's Globe

SESSION 4

Phylicia Rashad and Joseph Mydell in Conversation with Phylicia Rashad and Joseph Mydell (MIO '84)

Almost 30 years ago, Phylicia Rashad encouraged a group of students from Howard University, including Chadwick Boseman and Susan Kelechi Watson, to spend the summer studying Shakespeare with BADA in Oxford and then supported that group, recruiting friends like Denzel Washington to help pay their fees. She joins BADA's Patron, Joseph Mydell (MIO '84) to discuss Chadwick's love of Shakespeare, the African-American tradition in Shakespeare, the importance of international theatre training, and transatlantic theatrical encounters.

SESSION 4

Deep Azure

at Shakespeare's Globe

In this UK premiere of Deep Azure by late Academy Award and BAFTA-nominated actor and writer Chadwick Boseman (MIO '98), experience a powerful story of love, grief and justice.

When her fiancé, Deep, is killed by the police, Azure's world spirals out of control.

Powered by the spiritual imprint Deep has left on them all, Azure and Deep's friends – Roshad and Tone – do their best to find peace in the wake of the tragedy. However, the Heavenly MCs of Street Knowledge have other plans for them.

Inspired by the true events of university student Prince Jones, influenced by the poetry of Shakespeare and powered by the pulse of Hip-Hop theatre, Boseman's cathartic and lyrical epic unfolds in the Sam Wanamaker Playhouse.

Tristan Fynn-Aiduenu (For Black Boys Who Have Considered Suicide When The Hue Gets Too Heavy, New Diorama/Royal Court/Apollo and Pig Heart Boy, Unicorn Theatre/Sheffield Theatres/Children's Theatre Partnership) makes his Globe directorial debut.
